One creates a caricature by taking a significant trait, exaggerating it, and making it larger than life. This is how Jesus sets up the two extremes of religious attitudes in his day.

The Pharisee asks nothing for himself. He is undoubtedly no hypocrite. What he says, he does to perfection. Unfortunately, he is preoccupied with himself and is judging others. He is interested in God primarily as the one who will reaffirm the merits he lists.

In contrast to this religiously active man stands the tax collector. He does not make a prayer of thanksgiving. He confesses, not out of a need to clear his conscience, but to express all the pain that he is feeling. Finding nothing which can give him assurance before his judge he throws himself on the divine mercy. It is from that mercy that he hopes to receive his life as a grace, a gift.

This humble man goes home justified but the other does not. The Christian knows that the just one is never more than a person who has been justified, saved by God, beyond all merit.

Reflection

When we toot our horn, like the Pharisee in today's parable, we inflate ourselves enough to obscure and eclipse the truth that we are dependent on God. The tax collector, more conscious of his shortcomings and limitations than the Pharisee, also has a better sense of the truth: that we are utterly reliant on God's help to get us through, because we are too limited to do it on our own. ✠
