"This is the King of the Jews." In Luke this is a simple inscription, in Mark and Matthew a cause for condemnation, in John an affirmation disputed by the chief of priests. What a contrast there is between the inscription and the spectacle of the helpless crucified, between the salvation which some expected from him and the reality of this condemned man incapable of saving himself!

For Luke, Jesus on the cross, enduring mockeries and insults, is the type of the persecuted just one, martyred by the impious who hurl their defiance at him: "If you are the kind of the Jews, save yourself." Highlighting the reactions of the two criminals who surround Jesus, Luke shows two possible attitudes toward the Messiah. One man condemns himself by blaspheming this laughable king, the other turns to him through whom "we have redemption, the forgiveness of our sins" (Col 1:14). Jesus, who since his temptation in the desert, has refused any demonstration of power for his own advantage, claims that he can save the one who trusts in him, "this day you will be with me in paradise." "This day" is the time of the kingdom already present in the person of Jesus. Here, at the foot of the cross, the lordship of Christ takes root.
